Online streaming is bigger than ever, and with so many streaming services adding new shows and movies every week, it can be nearly impossible to sort through the good and the bad. If you need something to watch and don't want to wade through the digital muck that washes up on the internet's shores, follow our picks below for the best new shows and movies to stream on Netflix, Hulu, HBO, and other services. On the list this week: A new anthology from the Duplass brothers, the return of a brilliant comedy, and a spectacular war movie. Television today trends toward the grandiose; whether shows traffic in political scheming, criminal empires, or dragons, the goal is always to get bigger. Room 104, a new project from brothers Mark and Jay Duplass, takes a different path, constraining itself to one room for an entire season. Each episode is a self-contained story, each set in the same hotel room, following the various people who spend a night there. The show finds creativity in its constraints, playing with form and genre (some episodes take the shape of intimate dramas, others horror movies). Like most anthology series, the quality varies between episodes, but even at its weakest, Room 104 is an exciting experiment. HBO Pitch for a film: A romantic comedy following a 20-something artist struggling to find success in New York City, whose humdrum life gets a shot of excitement when they make a new connection. Alright, so the premise of The Incredible Jessica James is nothing new, but James Strouse's latest film is a fine showcase for Jessica Williams, comedian and former Daily Show correspondent, who delivers an entrancing performance as the titular character. The film begins with James, a playwright unable to get her plays produced or find a meaningful relationship, going on an awkward date with recently divorced app developer Boone (Chris O'Dowd). Despite the first date disaster, they keep hanging out, perhaps united by a mutual love of acerbic remarks. The Incredible Jessica James lacks a compelling narrative arc but its central lovers are well-written and charming enough to watch. Netflix Issa Rae's intimate comedy Insecure follows a pair of women, Issa (Rae) and Molly (Yvonne Orji), whose friendship carries them through troubles both personal and professional. Issa is a nonprofit worker unsatisfied with her job and slacker boyfriend. Molly is an attorney struggling to climb the professional ladder and find a lover who is ready for commitment. The show examines their relationships and foibles with an empathetic eye, but the show is hardly gloomy; it has a verve and wit that place it among the best of today's comedies. HBO An adaptation of David Wong's popular (and bizarre) comedy horror novel, John Dies at the End is a psychedelic adventure in the vein of Big Trouble in Little China or The Adventures of Buckaroo Banzai Across the 8th Dimension. The film is framed through a conversation between David (Chase Williamson) and reporter Arnie Blondestone (Paul Giamatti), in which David recounts how he and his friend John (Rob Mayes) tried out a drug called "Soy Sauce," which enabled them to see creatures from other dimensions. The revelation leads them down a rabbit hole of sinister conspiracies and wacky encounters, the film swaying from comedy to horror. John Dies at the End is not a great film but it is an entertaining one, with a unique structure and sense of humor that makes up for its shortcomings. Hulu It takes a lot for a World War II film to stand out but Hacksaw Ridge was a remarkable achievement, both as a war movie and a return to critical acclaim for director Mel Gibson. The film is based on the true story of Desmond Doss (Andrew Garfield), a young man who joins the army to serve his country but declines to kill or even carry a gun due to his religious beliefs. This makes him a target for his commanders and fellow soldiers, who view it as an act of cowardice, but Doss holds firmly to his stance, getting permission to serve as an unarmed medic. In our review, we singled out the film's beautiful juxtaposition of spiritual and worldly struggle, highlighting the Americans' harrowing assault on Hacksaw Ridge, a scene bathed in smoke and blood. HBO Editors' Recommendations An escape game can be stressful and frustrating and difficult, or it can be fun and empowering and...still difficult. These tips aren't going to ruin escape rooms by making them too easy. But they might save your next team-building activity from becoming an hour of futility and failure. You can't make escape rooms boring by getting very good at them. Ben Enos and Mark Flint, creative leads at the multi-city escape room company The Escape Game, know exactly how escape rooms are designed. But even after playing over 200 escape rooms around the world, they still love playing new ones. Here's what they do—and don't do—to build a room. How to find a good escape room There's a wide spectrum of escape room quality, says Mark, and the difference matters a lot more than choosing, say, movie theaters. There are four ways to find good rooms: Read reviews Search TripAdvisor, the first place Ben and Mark check room reviews. The site collects lists of the best rooms in different countries (like the U.S.) and cities (like Paris). Read escape room enthusiast sites and forums. Try Escape Authority Forums, the Escape Rooms subreddit, and the Facebook group Escape Room Enthusiasts. Different rooms gather a reputation, so look at a few forums, plus blogs like the Codex, Escape Room Tips, and Room Escape Artist, and notice what rooms keep getting named and praised. Look at photos Photos are a great way to tell the "build quality" of the room, says Ben. You'll also get a gut feeling about whether the room feels fun. "The pictures help you rule out some games," says Mark. A room doesn't have to be fancy to be fun, but you should be able to tell if it was thoughtfully designed. "There's a big variation in the investment of time and care," he says. Look for rooms with a clear theme or storyline. Most room reviewers are careful not to spoil the room with their pictures, but if you're cautious, look at pictures on the room's official site. Those might be more idealized, but they'll keep the room's secrets secret. Know what you want Mark and Ben design their games to appeal to everyone—"a nine-year-old girl in a birthday party, a group of lawyers from New York, a bachelorette party from here in Nashville." So don't worry that you'll pick a room that requires specialized knowledge. Still, you should look for rooms with themes that excite you and a difficulty level that feels appropriate. (The Escape Game rates its games on a 10-point difficulty scale, but most games land between 7 and 9. Double-check difficulties on the enthusiast sites.) Come again Most brands are consistent in quality, whether that quality is high or low. "It's rare that you go and find a really amazing game and a really poor game," says Ben. So if you liked your first trip to a specific brand of game, you'll probably like your second. He and Mark try to give their games a wide variety, so that playing them all won't feel samey: each themed room has a different structure, different puzzle types, new surprises. Some chains can be more predictable; one mall chain, says Mark, tends to build all its puzzles as L-shaped rooms with a hidden room. This won't disappoint you if you play one or two games, but if you return often enough, you'll start to notice the predictability. How to solve a room Mark and Ben agree with the tips in this Mark Rober video, and they have several to add. They all revolve around teamwork—because no one's going to solve an escape room themselves in an hour. Escape rooms are a game where a group of friends or co-workers get locked into a space to play some Read more Talk talk talk Teams that communicate will generally succeed, says Ben. That communication starts as soon as you enter the room: as you all scatter and look for clues, call out when you come across anything interesting. Mark and Ben have seen a lot of teams fail because someone hogged a clue and didn't bother telling the group. Talk in terms of what you have and what you think it might do. "I've got an X that needs Y." But be ready for alternate ideas. The worst thing, Mark says, is someone who makes themselves the leader, and then chases after the wrong solution. If you know some, but not all, of your teammates, don't stick close to the people you know. When Ben and his wife play with strangers, the two of them split into different subteams, so together they can share everyone's information. Play to your strengths Escape rooms are built to reward different problem-solving abilities. (The Escape Game homepage calls out roles like "Aunt Phoebe the problem solver" and "Grandpa Ron the clue collector.") You might know your abilities already—math, memory games, anagrams, looking really hard under rugs—or you might figure them out on the fly. Don't do anything alone That said, if you're hitting a wall—and even an advanced room solver sometimes will—then hand your clues to someone else. It's easy to get caught up in your head, especially when you've built a certain narrative around a clue, and you're convinced that this math puzzle is actually a Morse code puzzle. And "trust but verify," the designers say. You may think you went through every pocket of that coat, but let someone else double-check. How to Rally in Your Darkest Hour Energy can flag after a half hour in the escape room, especially if you're getting stuck. Mark recommends a pep talk. Take inventory out loud, discuss everyone's status, get them talking again. This is a good time to suggest a team reorg. And know when to take a hint. Literally: most escape rooms let you ask the room attendant for specific hints. They're watching you complete the room, so they'll know the next step you need to take. You'll feel a lot better if you finish with one or two hints than you will if you fail because you were too proud to get some help.
